Winterthur's Office of Advanced Studies offers three courses that build upon the methodology of the connoisseurship offerings. Fellows take a required seminar on American Material Life. In this course they work with both collection objects and primary documents in the Museum's research library. An elective course on American Craftsmanship includes wide-ranging readings as well as a behind-the-scenes field study at Colonial Williamsburg. Fellows may also elect a seminar that concentrates on topics such as Religion in Material Life, and American Arts and Crafts.

Graduate Seminars at The University of Delaware

Since its inception in 1952, the Winterthur Program has taken a multi-disciplinary approach to the study of material culture. The University's distinguished departments of Art History, English and History provide graduate seminars that introduce fellows to the latest disciplinary scholarship that bears on the study of material culture. Fellows take one graduate seminar in each of these three departments.

The Art History department offers courses on Vernacular Architecture, American Painting, Neo-Classicism in America and Folk and Outsider Art. In the English department, fellows may choose from a variety of graduate seminars, including Colonial American Literature, The Victorian Novel and Literary Theory. The History department's offerings encompass a wide range of topics including American Social and Cultural History, Revolutionary America and Images of Race and Ethnicity in American Life.
