Pills: the What, How and Why

While many parents may worry about their teens using illicit drugs, one of the biggest dangers today is not the use of illegal drugs, but the misuse of legal prescription drugs. One in five Delaware teens has used a prescription drug not their own in the past year. This includes diet pills, tranquilizers and barbiturates, psychoactive drugs prescribed to help students concentrate in school, and, the most abused and most dangerous of all prescription painkillers.

What are the risks?

Students do not consider the risk of using prescription medications non-medicinally as great as the use of illegal drugs. Because they were prescribed by a doctor for someone and because they are controlled by the federal Food and Drug Administration, they are thought to be safe.

What students may not consider is that
1. Drugs available illegally may not be the FDA approved drug, but may be a “look alike,” produced illegally specifically for the illegal market;
2. Teens do not have knowledge of appropriate dosage, which can vary from person to person;
3. Many of these drugs are highly addictive; and
4. Drugs may interact with other drugs the student takes by legal prescription or illegally, or with alcohol used in the same time period. This has led to large increases in admissions to treatment and Emergency Rooms, as well as increases in drug-related fatalities.

Where do they get them?

One of the reasons teens are so likely to use illicit prescription drugs is that they are so easy to get. Many teens report getting them from their friends, their parents, the family medicine cabinet, or someone else’s house. Whether they are bought or shared, they are most likely gotten from someone the teen knows.
