

PRINCETON LIBRARY OF ASIAN TRANSLATIONS

ADVISORY COMMITTEE: Marius Jansen, Earl Miner, James Morley, J. Thomas Rimer

TITLES PUBLISHED

Ôkagami (The Great Mirror), TRANSLATED BY Helen McCullough.

Told Round a Brushwood Fire (The Autobiography of Arai Hakuseki), TRANSLATED BY Joyce Ackroyd.

NOTICE: This material may be protected by copyright law (Title 17, U. S. Code).

IAN HIDEO LEVY

The Ten Thousand Leaves

A TRANSLATION OF THE

Man'yōshū,

JAPAN'S PREMIER

ANTHOLOGY OF

CLASSICAL POETRY

VOLUME ONE

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS

1981

BY THE AUTHOR

The road alongside the mountains (Yamanohe no michi)

POEMS ON VARIOUS THEMES

THE REIGN OF EMPEROR YŪRYAKU, WHO RULED THE REALM UNDER HEAVEN FROM THE ASAKURA PALACE IN HATSUSE (456-479)

Poem by the Emperor

Girl with your basket,
with your pretty basket,
with your shovel,
with your pretty shovel,
gathering shoots on the hillside here.
I want to ask your home.
Tell me your name!
This land of Yamato, seen by the gods on high—
it is all my realm, in all of it I am supreme.
I will tell you my home and my name.

THE REIGN OF EMPEROR JOMEI, WHO RULED THE REALM UNDER HEAVEN FROM THE OKAMOTO PALACE AT TAKECHI (629-642)

4

Poem by the Emperor when he climbed Kagu Hill to view the land

Many are the mountains of Yamato, but I climb heavenly Kagu Hill that is cloaked in foliage, and stand on the summit
to view the land.

On the plain of land,
smoke from the hearths rises, rises.

On the plain of waters, gulls rise one after another.
A splendid land is the dragonfly island,¹ the land of Yamato.

3 and 4

Poem which Princess Nakatsu bud Hashrhitō Oyu present when the Emperor went hunting on the fields of Uchi

Our Lord, sovereign
of the earth's eight corners,
in the morning

¹ "Dragonfly island" (akitsushima). The Kojiki "explains" this traditional epithet for Yamato with the incident, recorded during an excursion to Yoshino by Emperor Yūryaku in which the Emperor was bitten by a horsefly, which was in turn devoured by a dragonfly.

held and caressed
his catalpa bow.
In the evening
he stood beside it.
I can hear its golden tips resound.
Now he must be setting out on his morning hunt.
Now he must be setting out on his evening hunt.
I can hear the golden tips of his catalpa bow resound.

Envoy

Lining his steeds
on the plain of Uchi, he must be walking
over morning fields—
those fields so rank with grass!

5 and 6

Poem written by Prince Ikusa as he looked at the mountains where the Emperor had gone on his procession to Aya County in the land of Sanuki

Not even knowing
if the long spring day has drawn through its mist into evening,
my heart,
these twines of inner flesh,
in pain,

135

II.

At Cape Kara²
 on the Sea of Iwami, where the vines
 crawl on the rocks, rockweed of the deep grows on the reefs
 and sleek seaweed
 grows on the desolate shore.
 As deeply do I think of my wife
 who swayed toward me in sleep like the lithe seaweed.
 Yet few were the nights we had slept together before we were parted like crawling vines uncurled.
 And so I look back, still thinking of her
 with painful heart,
 this clench of inner flesh, but in the storm
 of fallen scarlet leaves on Mount Watari, crossed as on a great ship,
 I cannot make out the sleeves she waves in farewell.

²Preceding "Cape Kara" is an untranslatable epithet, "koto saeku." "Kara" also means "China," and the epithet's meaning. "babbling words," refers to the incomprehensible foreign tongue. This is a purely formal pillow-word—a pun—and has nothing to do with the place Cape Kara itself.

For she, alas,
 is slowly hidden
 like the moon
 in its crossing
 between the clouds over Yagami Mountain
 just as the evening sun coursing through the heavens has begun to glow, and even I who thought I was a brave man find the sleeves
 of my well-woven robe drenched with tears.

136 and 137

Envoys

The quick gallop
 of my dapple-blue steed races me to the clouds, passing far away
 from where my wife dwells.

O scarlet leaves
 falling on the autumn mountainside:
 stop, for a while, the storm your strewing makes, that I might glimpse the place where my wife dwells.

wilting
 like the summer grass, staggering
 like an evening star, reeling
 like a great boat,
 we cannot console ourselves, we do not know what to do.
 At least let us remember,
 if only the sound,
 if only the name,
 forever far and long
 as heaven and earth.
 Ten thousand ages
 to the Asuka River
 that bears the name of our beloved Princess:
 her memento,
 it is here.

197 and 198

Tanka

If they had piled branches across the Asuka River to stop its course, even the streaming waters would have become quiet.

Asuka, river of “tomorrow’s fragrance”: hoping, but in vain, to meet her at least tomorrow, I cannot forget my Princess’ name.

199

Poem by Kakinomoto Hitomaro at the time of the temporary enshrinement of Prince Takechi at Kinoe

with tanka

I hesitate to put it in words, it is an awesome thing to speak.
 Our Lord,
 who, while we trembled, fixed the far and heavenly halls of his shrine on the fields of Makami in Asuka and, godlike, has secluded himself in the rocks there,
 he,
 who ruled the earth’s eight corners, crossed Fuwa Mountain, lined with thick black pines, in the northern land of his realm and went down,
 as from heaven,
 to the provinces,
 encamping on the plain of Wazami, Wazami
 of the Korean swords.
 To hold sway over the realm under heaven and bring his dominions to peace, he gathered his soldiers in the eastern country, where the cock cries,
 and gave the task to his son, he being an imperial prince:

to pacify the raging rebels and subdue the defiant lands.

Then our Prince
girded his great body with his long sword and took in his great hands his bow.
The sound of the drums, calling the troops to ready, boomed like the very voice of thunder, and the echoing notes of the signaller's flute grew, to the terror of all, like the roar of a tiger with prey in its eyes.
The rippling of the high-held banners was like the rippling of the fires struck across every field when spring comes, bursting winter's bonds, and the roar of the bowstrings they plucked was so fearful, we thought it a hurricane whirling through a snowfallen winter forest.
When the arrows they let loose swarmed like a blinding swirl of snow, the resisters, standing defiant, also resolved to perish, if they must,
like the dew and frost.
As they struggled
 like zooming birds,
the divine wind
from the Shrine of our offerings at Ise in Watarai
blew confusion upon them, hiding the very light of day as clouds blanketed the heavens in eternal darkness.

Thus pacifying this land, abundant in ears of rice,
our Lord, sovereign
of the earth's eight corners,
 a very god,
firmly drove his palace pillars and proclaimed his rule over the realm under heaven—for ten thousand generations, we thought.
But just as his reign flourished brilliant as the white bouquets of mulberry paper,
suddenly they deck his princely halls to make a godly shrine, and the courtiers who served him now wear mourning clothes of white hemp.
On the fields
before the Haniyasu Palace gate they crawl and stumble like deer as long as the sun still streams its crimson, and when pitch-black night descends they crawl around like quail, tuning to look up at the great halls.
They wait upon him,
but they wait in vain,
and so they moan
like the plaintive birds of spring.
Before their cries can be stilled or their mournful thoughts exhausted the divine cortege is borne from the Kudara Plain, borne away.

 Loftily he raises
 the palace at Kinoe,
 good of hempen cloth,
 as his eternal shrine.
 A god, his soul is stilled there.
 Yet could we even Imagine that his palace by Kagu Hill will pass away in the ten thousand generations he intended as he built?
 I turn to gaze on it as I would on the heavens, bearing it in my heart
 like a strand of jewels, preciously remembering, awesome though it be.

200 and 201

Envoys

Although you rule
 the far heavens now,
 we go on longing for you, unmindful of the passing of sun and moon.

Not knowing where they will drift, like the hidden puddles that run on the banks of Haniyasu Pond, the servingmen stand bewildered.

202

One book has for an envoy,

Offering him sacred wine, we pray at the shrine of Nakisawa, the marsh of tears.
 But our Lord is gone to rule the high heavens.

In the Forest of Classified Verse, the above poem is said to be "by Princess Hinokuma, in her anger at the Nakisawa Shrine (for the Prince's absence)." The Nihonshoki states that the later Crown Prince, Takechi, died in autumn, on the tenth day of the seventh month, in the tenth year of the reign (696).

203

Poem by Prince Hozumi crying in sorrow on a winter day after the death of Princess Tajima, as he looked out through the falling snow toward her grave

Falling snow,
 do not fall so hard.
 Do not be a barrier to my sight of Ikai Hill in Yonabari.

248

Another poem by Prince Nagata

Today I saw the Satsuma Channel, Satsuma
 of the wild Hayato men, distant as the dwelling of the clouds.

249-256

Eight poems of travel by Kakinomoto Hitomaro

249

Fearing the billows off Cape Mitsu,
 you have passed the night by the island on your boat in the hidden cove.¹

250

Passing Minume,
 where they cut the sleek seaweed,
 our boat has drawn near Cape Noshima, rank with summer grass.

A variant has,

Passing Otome,
 where they cut the sleek seaweed, I build my temporary lodge on Cape Noshima,
 rank with summer grass.

¹ This translation is based on a reading of the last two phrases of the original poem as funa naru kimi wa / yadorimu shima ni, one of a dozen possible readings of the obscure characters 舟公官奴嶋余

251

At Cape Noshima in Awaji, the cords of my sleeves that my wife tied for me are blown backward in the beach wind.

252

Do they see me as a fisher catching perch in Fujie Cove, of the hempen cloth,
I who journey?

A variant has,

Do they see me as a fisher angling in Fujie Cove, of the white cloth,
 I who journey?

253

Even as I think how hard it is to leave behind the fields of Inabi, the island of Kago,
 for which my heart yearns, comes into sight.

254

Will I part rowing to the sun that sinks into the Akashi Straits, bright with lampfires,
 the land of home beyond my sight?

255

Over a long road,
 from barbarian lands
 at the far reach of the heavens, I have come, yearning.
 And now the Straits of Akashi open on the island, Yamato.

A variant has,

open on the land of my home

256

The surface of the sea at Kehi looks peaceful; I can see, bobbling out in confusion like rushes scythed from roots, the boats of fishermen.

A variant has,

The surface of the sea at Muko
 looks peaceful; I can see,
 above the waves,
 the boats of angling fishermen.

257

Poem about Kagu Hill by Lord Kamo Tarihito

with tanka

When spring comes,
 with rising mists,

to heavenly Kagu Hill, descended
 from the firmament,
 the wind in the pines
 raises waves on the pond, and darkening leaves
 thicken on the cherry trees.
 On the offing
 the lone duck cries for its mate, by the shore
 the spotted ducks flock and rustle.
 Courtiers of the great palace, its ramparts
 thick with stone,
 have taken their leave;
 oars and poles
 are gone from the boats, and it is lonely,
 with no one there to row them.

258 and 259

Two envoys

And I can clearly see that the boats lie unrowed, for the diving mandarin and the teal have made them their home.

When did Kagu's halberd cedar turn so venerably aged that moss spreads on its roots?

336

Poem by the Priest Mansei about floss-silk

He was the imperial attendant who built the Kannonji Temple in Tsukushi. His lay name was Kasa Maro.

Keeping it with me,
 I have yet to put it on.
 But it looks warm,
 this floss-silk from Tsukushi.

337

Poem by Yamanoue Okura, upon leaving a banquet

Okura shall take his leave now.
 My child must be crying and its mother,
 who bears it on her back,
 must be waiting for me.

338-350

Thirteen poems in praise of wine by Lord Ōtomo Tabito, the Commander of the Dazaiфу

338

Rather than engaging in useless worries,
 it's better to down a cup of raw wine.

339

Great sages of the past gave the name of "sage" to wine.
 How well they spoke!

340

What the Seven Wise Men of ancient times
 wanted, it seems,
 was wine.

341

Rather than making pronouncements with an air of wisdom, it's better to down the wine and sob drunken tears.

342

What is most noble, beyond all words
 and beyond all deeds,
 is wine.

343

Rather than be half-heartedly human,
 I wish I could be a jug of wine and be soaked in it!

344

How ugly!
 those men who,
 with airs of wisdom,
 refuse to drink wine.
 Take a good look,
 and they resemble apes.

345

How could even a priceless treasure
 be better than a cup
 of raw wine?

346

How could even a gem that glitters in the night be as good as drinking wine and cleansing the heart?

347

Here in this life,
 on these roads of pleasure, it is fun to sob drunken tears.

348

As long as I have fun
 in this life,
 let me be an Insect or a bird in the next.

349

Since all who live
 must finally die,
 let's have fun
 while we're still alive.

350

Smug and silent airs of wisdom are still not as good as downing a cup of wine and sobbing drunken tears.

351

Poem by the Priest Mansei

To what shall I compare this life?
 the way a boat
 rowed out from the morning harbor leaves no traces on the sea.

456

Longing for you,
 there is nothing I can do, so, like the cranes
 among the reeds,
 I weep and cry aloud
 in the morning and the evening.

457

Lord whom I thought I would serve far into the distant future, you are no more,
 and my heart has lost its bearing.

458

Crawling like a baby, I weep, and I cry aloud
 in the morning and the evening, now that you, my Lord, are gone.

The above five poems were written by Tabito's servant, YoMyōgun, who loved his master as a dog or horse would, unable to repress the emotions in his heart.

459

My Lord, I never tired to look upon you
 while you were alive;
 such sadness now that you are gone like the scattered leaves of autumn.

Agatanoinukai Hitogami, Administrator of the Board of Inner Ceremonies, was ordered to minister to Lord Ōtomo's illness. But the medicine had no effect. Running water cannot be stopped-the Lord died. Agatanoinukai, grief-struck over this, wrote the above poem.

460

Poem by Lady Ōtomo Sakanoue in the seventh year of Tempyō (735), grieving over the death of the nun Rigwan

with tanka

Hearing that this is a good land,
 she came from Silla,
 land of mulberry-woven nets,
 and crossed to Japan,
 where she had no relations, no brothers and sisters to talk to.
 The sun-blessed capital of our Lord's realms is packed with many quarters and houses, but-what could have been in her mind?—

she was drawn,
 like a weeping child
 to its parents,
 to the Saho mountainside, so foreign to her.
 There she built a house where she could place her well-woven pillow, and has dwelled there
 through the long years.
 But she could not escape the fact that all who live must die;
 while everyone she depended on was away on a journey, with grass for pillows, she crossed the Saho River
 in the morning
 and, glancing back on the fields of Kasuga, disappeared toward the mountainside as one fades
 into the gathering darkness of evening, There is nothing I can say, nothing I can do,
 so I wander
 all alone
 without a moment to dry my white mourning robes—do these tears
 I cry in my grief trail as clouds over Arima Mountain and fall as rain?

461

Envoy

Life's course cannot be stopped, and so she is gone out from the house where she kept her well-woven pillow, and is hidden in the clouds.

The above refer to a nun from Silla in Korea, her name Rigwan. She felt our ruler's virtue from afar, and came to our holy realm and was naturalized. She lived in the home of Lord Ōtomo Yasumaro, Chancellor and Commander of the Army, and had been there for some years when,
 in the seventh year of Tempyō (735), she suddenly came down with a fatal disease, and was soon away to the realm of the dead. At this time Lady Ishikawa was at the hot springs of Arima for her cure, and was unable to attend the funeral. Her daughter, however, asked that she be allowed to interrupt her journey and go alone to perform the obsequies. Thus she wrote this poem and sent it to her mother at the hot springs.

462

Poem written by Ōtomo Yakamochi in summer, the sixth month, of the eleventh year of Tempyō (739), in his grief over his dead concubine

Soon the autumn winds will be blowing coldly;
 how can I sleep
 through the long nights alone?

886 and 891

Six poems respectfully presented in response to Asada Yasu's, expressing Kumakori's intention FOR him

By Yamanoue Okura, the Governor of Chikuzen

Preface

Ōtomo Kumakori was a man of Mashiki County in the province of Higo. At the age of eighteen, on the seventeenth day of the sixth month of the third year of Temyō (731), he became a retainer in the service of the governor of that province, who had been appointed Bearer of the Sumō Wrestlers, and set off for the capital. But—could it have been Heaven's will?—unfortunately he contracted a disease on the road, and died at the Takaba horse station in Saeki County in the province of Aki.

Just before his death Kumakori gave a long sigh and said, "I have heard it recounted that, 'Man's body, a temporary assemblage of the elements, is easily destroyed, and the course of life, like bubbles on the water, is hard to hold back.' Thus the thousand saints have all passed away, and the hundred sages could not remain in this world. How, then, could a mere common man like myself, of mean station, possibly escape from death? But I am concerned about my aged parents, both of them alive in their humble hut, who pass their days waiting for my return. Naturally their hearts will be rent with grief. If I do not return when they expect me to, I know their tears will be enough to blind them. O my father, how sorrowful for you! O my mother, how painful for you! It does not bother me that I myself must tread the road of death. I only lament the hardships my parents will face when they are left behind without me. Today we must part for eternity—in what life will we ever meet again?"

Kumakori then composed six poems, and died. The poems:

886

To go up to the palace
swept with sunlight, I left my mother's arms, my mother
with her milk-full breasts, and set out for the depths of lands I have never known, and crossed beyond a hundred folds of mountains.
Talking with my companions and wondering how soon I could set my eyes on the capital—
then pain struck my body, I collapsed
on a corner of the road—road like a jewelled spear—and, plucking grass and spreading gromwell
for my bed,
I lay down,
and as I lay
I sighed with longing:
If I were in my homeland, my father would hold and nurse me;
if I were in my house,
my mother would hold and nurse me.
The world, it seems,
comes but to this—must I end my life falling by the roadside like a dog?

887

In which direction will I leave, my soul darkened,
 parting from my mother,
 with her milk-full breasts,
 unable to meet her eyes?

888

How can I make my way through the darkness
 down the long road
 I have never known?
 I have no provisions.

889

If I were home and my mother held
 and nursed me,
 it would soothe my heart, even-if I must—were I to die.

890

O my father and mother who must be waiting for me, counting the days
 since I went away and thinking, "Today! Today!"

891

Must I depart for eternity, leaving behind
 my father and mother, whom I can never see twice in a single lifetime?²⁵

892

Dialog of the Destitute

with tanka

"On nights when rain falls, mixed with wind,
 on nights when snow falls,
 mixed with rain,
 I am cold.
 And the cold
 leaves me helpless:
 I lick black lumps of salt and suck up melted dregs of rake.
 Coughing and sniffing,
 I smooth my uncertain wisps of heard,
 I am proud—
 I know no man
 is better than me.
 But I am cold.
 I pull up my hempen nightclothes and throw on every scrap

²⁵If read literally, this poem seems redundant. But "whom I can never see/twice in a single lifetime" is a quasi-epithetical modification of "my father and mother," operating like a formal (i.e., non-semantic) "pillow-word."

894

Poem wishing Godspeed to the Ambassador to China with two envoys

It has been recounted down through time since the age of the gods:
 that this land of Yamato is a land of imperial deities' stern majesty,
 a land blessed by the spirit of words.
 Every man of the present sees it before his eyes and knows it to be true.

Men fill this land
 with their numbers,
 but among them our Emperor, sovereign of the high-shining sun,
 a very god,
 in the fullness of his love, chose for this mission
 you, the son of a house that governs the realm under heaven.
 And with the favor
 of his great command, you have been sent to the distant borders of China.

As you set out,
 all the mighty deities that, in their godliness, abide by the shore and by the offing, there to rule the plain of waters, lead you by the prow of your ship.

 And the mighty gods
 of heaven and earth,
 first among them
 the Supreme Spirit of the Land of Yamato,
 soar from the distant heavenly skies to watch over you.

And on the day when,
 your mission accomplished,
 you return,
 again the mighty gods shall take the prow of your ship in their noble hands and bring you straight as a black rope stretched from Chika Cape
 to your berth by Ōtomo's noble beach.
 Go without hindrance,
 go with good fortune,
 and quickly return!

895 and 896

Envoys

I shall sweep the beach clean by the field of pines
 at Ōtomo's noble cove,
 and stand there waiting for you.
 Quickly return!

When I hear the news that the imperial craft has berthed at Naniwa Cove, I shall run to greet you, my waistcord trailing loose.

On the third month, first day, of the fifth year of Temyō, you visited me at my borne. I present you this on the third.

From Yamanoue Okura, with humility To His Excellency the Ambassador to China

An essay lamenting his own long illness

By Yamanoue Okura

In my private thoughts it occurs to me that even those men who obtain their livelihood by hunting, morning and evening, on the mountains and the plains are able to make their way through life without calamity (I speak of those who, with bow and arrow in their hands, ignoring the six fasting days on which the taking of life is forbidden, slay every animal they come across, regardless of young or old, pregnant or not). Even those who fish day and night in the rivers and on the sea are vouchsafed their fortune and their safe passage through life (I speak of the fisherman and the diving woman, each with his or her effort of work, the man clutching his bamboo pole who angles skillfully over the waves, the woman, with scythe and basket tied to her waist, who dives into the sea to pluck life from the depths).

But I, since the day I was born until today, have intended to do only good deeds and have had no thoughts of doing evil (I have followed the teachings "to eschew the various evil deeds" and "to perform the various good deeds"). I have revered the Three Treasures—Buddha, Law, and Priesthood-, foregoing not a day of effort (reading the sutras every day and atoning for my sins). I have venerated the myriad deities, neglecting not an evening (doing homage to the various deities of heaven and earth). Oh how shameful! What crime have I committed, that I should meet with this dreadful disease! (Is this for past crimes, or is it the result of present transgressions? How could I, who am innocent of sin, be struck down with this illness?)

Many are the months and years since I first contracted this disease (it has been more than ten years). I am presently seventy-four years old. My hair is spotted with white, and my muscles have lost their strength. And now to the sufferings of old age, now to those burdens has been added this affliction of sickness. This is what the proverbs must mean when they speak of pouring salt into a painful wound, of cutting off the edges of a stick already too short. I cannot move my four limbs, my hundred joints all ache, my body feels terribly heavy, as if I were carrying a load of a hundred and fifty pounds.²⁶ Clutching a strip of cloth, I try to pull myself up, only to collapse like a bird with broken wings. Leaning on my cane and trying to walk, I am like an old donkey whose legs are gone.

My body is sunk deeply in the vulgar, and my heart is tainted with the dirt of this world. Therefore I wished to know where affliction lurks and where the curse of retribution is hidden. I went to inquire at every sorcerer's gate, to every shaman's chamber. Whether true or false, I followed all their instructions, never failing to hang prayer cloths and offer invocations. But the pangs of disease only ²⁶The original text has "kinseki" (鈔斤), a curious combination of two different weights. This is followed by an interlinear note which, going through the various weight equivalents in use at the time, concludes, "four kin (鈔) equal one jaku (斤), all together 120 kon (斤)." This would be 158.4 pounds.